

Commissioners:

I strongly oppose this rule for the following reasons:

1. Owners of a company deserve regular, accurate, and unfiltered financial information from the companies in which they invest. Management has access to this information as part of operating the business; if it is important for management to know, it is equally important for investors to know.
2. Any cost savings from eliminating quarterly reporting requirements would be insignificant. Companies already collect financial information at least monthly, and management routinely has access to that information. The costs of gathering and maintaining these data are already reflected in company operations and financial reporting processes. Any potential savings are outweighed by the reduction in transparency that this rule would permit.
3. Eliminating quarterly reporting will reduce market liquidity and slow the flow of capital to investors and companies alike. Investors will be less willing to commit capital to more speculative investments—such as smaller companies, emerging technologies, and companies with limited operating histories—if updated financial information may not be available for as long as six months. Reduced transparency increases uncertainty, which in turn increases the cost of capital and discourages investment.

My perspective is informed by managing my own investments since the 1980s and by decades of involvement with the investment processes and technologies that support professional investment management. Timely, accurate financial information is essential to sound security valuation and informed investment decisions.

In summary, this proposal provides no meaningful benefit to investors, reduces transparency, meaningfully increases investment risk, and should be rejected summarily by the Commission.
