

Subject: Public Comment on File No. S7-03-26 – Opposition to Semi-Annual Reporting Transition

To the Securities and Exchange Commission:

I am writing as a self-directed retail investor and software developer who builds custom analytical tools for portfolio management. I strongly oppose the proposal to shift from quarterly (10-Q) to semi-annual (6-month) reporting requirements.

Moving to a semi-annual schedule does not "modernize" our markets. Instead, it obscures them. Specifically, I would like the Commission to consider the following points:

- Institutional Information Asymmetry: In a 2026 market defined by high-frequency trading and real-time data, a six-month reporting gap is an eternity. Large institutional firms have the resources to "proxy" a company's health through alternative data methods such as satellite imagery, credit card scrapes, and supply chain tracking, et. al. The individual investor relies on the SEC's periodic filings as the only verified "level playing field." Removing two of these checks per year hands a permanent, unfair advantage to institutions and hedge funds.
- The "Cost Savings" Fallacy: The argument that this change saves significant capital for issuers is mathematically flawed. These companies maintain the same accounting systems, the same internal audit teams, and the same compliance staff regardless of filing frequency. The cost of "preparing the materials" is a decimal point on the balance sheet of a mid-to-large cap firm. Trading market transparency for negligible administrative savings is a poor bargain for the American retail investor.
- The Risk of "Information Shocks": When reporting is frequent, the market can digest data in smaller increments. Moving to 180-day windows will lead to massive, destabilizing "gap-downs" or "gap-ups" when the reports finally drop. For those of us who manage risk using a 13-week performance window, a six-month vacuum makes disciplined risk management nearly impossible.

I urge the Commission to maintain the current quarterly reporting standards. Transparency should not be sacrificed for the sake of corporate convenience.

Sincerely,
