Re: Semiannual Reporting; File No. S7-2026-15; Release Nos. 33-11414; 34-105368; 39-2563; IC-36140

Dear Ms. Countryman:

I write in response to the Commission's request for comment on the proposed amendments to Exchange Act Rules 13a-13 and 15d-13 that would permit domestic reporting companies to file a semiannual report on new Form 10-S in lieu of two of three quarterly reports on Form 10-Q. I have practiced as a corporate and securities lawyer for more than twenty-seven years, including as a partner at Freshfields Bruckhaus Deringer, Paul Weiss Rifkind Wharton & Garrison, K&L Gates, and Smith Anderson, and in senior in-house roles as chief legal officer building legal functions for public market readiness. The perspective I bring to this comment letter is shaped by having advised, and served as de facto general counsel to, public companies across the full range of the reporting company population. That has included large accelerated filers with deep institutional ownership, established analyst coverage, active capital markets programs, and the full institutional disclosure architecture that mature public company status requires. It has also included smaller reporting companies, emerging growth companies, and recently public issuers operating in earlier stages of that institutional progression, where the quarterly reporting cadence often feels disproportionate to the operational tempo of the business. The disclosure liability gap and on-ramp questions I address in this letter come from running quarterly reporting cycles at both ends of that range, not from one end. I submit this letter in my capacity as Founder of Zukunft Advisory.

I do not oppose the proposal. The Commission's policy rationale for offering reporting companies an alternative to the existing quarterly cadence is defensible, and the cost-reduction objective is real for the subset of issuers for whom quarterly reporting has always been disproportionate to the operational tempo of the business. My concern with the proposal as currently drafted is narrower and, I believe, addressable. The proposing release does not adequately engage with what replaces the quarterly cadence for companies that elect semiannual reporting and continue to communicate with the market on a quarterly basis, which the release itself contemplates and which I believe will be the majority of electing issuers in practice. The institutional scaffolding that has historically made quarterly market communications defensible is anchored in the existence of the Form 10-Q. Removing the formal filing without addressing what supports the continuing communications creates a disclosure liability gap that the proposing release does not name and that the comment file to date has not addressed in operational terms.

The comment file to date is informative on what it does include, and equally so on what it does not. The early commenters have approached the proposal from academic, retail investor, market-function, and technology-infrastructure standpoints. These are useful perspectives, and the Commission will benefit from them. What the comment file does not yet contain in meaningful volume is commentary from practitioners who have run public company quarterly reporting cycles from the inside, who have negotiated the institutional architecture that supports those filings, and who have advised boards and management teams through the disclosure liability exposure that quarterly market communications generate. This letter is offered to address that gap. The arguments that follow are operational rather than theoretical, and the recommendations are calibrated to what the Commission would need to do in the final release to make the proposed framework workable for the issuers most likely to elect into it.

This letter offers five contributions. First, it identifies the disclosure liability gap created by the hybrid approach the proposing release contemplates. Second, it surfaces the audit committee, disclosure committee, and auditor review questions that follow from removing the formal quarterly filing while continuing quarterly market communications. Third, it proposes a four-component framework that semiannual filers should be expected to implement on top of the election to preserve the institutional discipline that has historically protected quarterly communications. Fourth, it addresses who the election actually fits and raises the on-ramp question that follows from the bifurcation the proposal will create between large accelerated filers (who will overwhelmingly not elect) and smaller, newer, and development-stage issuers (who will). Fifth, it responds directly to several of the Commission's numbered requests for comment and offers three specific recommendations for what the final release should contain.

I. The disclosure liability gap created by the hybrid approach

The proposing release explicitly contemplates that semiannual filers may continue to provide voluntary quarterly information, including through earnings releases, conference calls, and voluntary inclusion of quarterly financial information within the Form 10-S filing itself. The release describes this as a hybrid approach that may represent a middle ground for companies seeking to balance cost savings with market expectations. The Commission's description is accurate so far as it goes. What the release does not engage with is that the hybrid approach, in practice, will be the operating posture of the substantial majority of electing issuers, not a middle ground reserved for those with specific institutional ownership profiles or capital markets needs.

The reasons are structural. Analyst coverage of U.S. public companies is built around quarterly models. Institutional investors maintain valuation frameworks that require quarterly revenue, earnings, and guidance updates. Lenders incorporate financial covenant certification and reporting requirements into credit agreements that often track the Form 10-Q schedule by default. Boards have organized their meeting calendars and audit committee cadences around the quarterly filing cycle for decades. Investor relations functions have built their annual programs around four earnings cycles. The semiannual election does not change any of those expectations on day one. It removes one structural rationale for meeting them, but the underlying demand for quarterly information from analysts, institutional investors, lenders, and the broader market remains.

Most issuers that elect semiannual reporting will therefore continue to communicate with the market on a quarterly cadence. They will issue earnings releases. They will hold earnings calls. They will provide guidance and update it. They will respond to analyst questions. They will hold one-on-one investor meetings. What changes is not the existence of those communications. What changes is the institutional scaffolding that historically sat behind them.

The Form 10-Q is a Section 18 filed document. It carries CEO and CFO certifications under Sections 302 and 906 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002. It is reviewed by the independent auditor under PCAOB AS 4105 (or the analogous interim review standard applicable to the relevant filer). It runs through a disclosure committee process required by Item 307 and Item 308 of Regulation S-K. It is approved by the audit committee. Item 4 of Form 10-Q requires an express attestation regarding the effectiveness of disclosure controls and procedures and any changes in internal control over financial reporting. The Form 10-Q is the artifact produced at the end of that process, but the process itself is the institutional discipline that makes the quarterly communications surrounding the filing defensible.

When a company communicates quarterly without producing a Form 10-Q, that scaffolding is not automatically present. The earnings release is furnished under Item 2.02 of Form 8-K, not filed under Section 18. The auditor has performed no interim review because there is no periodic report to review. The disclosure committee may or may not have run a full process, because there is no statutory filing deadline driving it. The audit committee may or may not have completed a substantive review of the underlying financial statements, because the only quarterly artifact is a furnished press release rather than a certified filing. The CEO and CFO sign off on the release, but they make no certifications under Sections 302 or 906 because no underlying periodic report exists to certify. The forward-looking statements in the prepared remarks rest on a cautionary statement framework that, in the absence of a contemporaneous Form 10-Q, has no reaffirmed risk factor universe to anchor to. The earnings call proceeds with the same Q&A, the same guidance discussion, and the same competitive and operational commentary that a quarterly earnings call has always included, but the institutional record sitting behind those communications is materially thinner than it would be if a Form 10-Q were filed contemporaneously.

This gap is not theoretical. It is exactly the fact pattern that the plaintiffs' securities class action bar will construct cases around. The defense of a Rule 10b-5 case predicated on quarterly forward-looking statements, guidance, or operational commentary has historically relied substantially on the architecture of the periodic reporting process. The certifications, the auditor involvement, the disclosure committee discipline, the audit committee review, the Item 4 attestation. That architecture, taken as a whole, is what permits the issuer to argue at the pleading stage and beyond that the challenged statements were the product of a deliberate and supervised disclosure process rather than ad hoc executive judgment. The Form 10-S, filed twice a year, does not anchor the quarterly off-cycle communications in the same way. Plaintiffs' counsel will identify the gap. The Commission should anticipate it.

II. The audit committee, disclosure committee, and auditor review questions

Three operational questions follow directly from the disclosure liability gap and warrant the Commission's attention before the proposal is finalized.

A. The auditor review question

The auditing profession has not yet articulated publicly how it will approach interim review of quarterly financial information for semiannual filers that continue to issue quarterly earnings releases. Under AU-C 930 / AS 4105, an interim review is generally requested in connection with a periodic report containing reviewed interim financial information. Whether and on what terms a registered public accounting firm will perform interim review work outside the context of a Form 10-Q filing, and at what fee level, is unresolved. For most issuers electing semiannual reporting, particularly those with active capital markets activity, meaningful institutional ownership, or any material disclosure events expected during the off-cycle quarter, an interim review of the quarterly financial information that underlies the earnings release will continue to be necessary as a matter of disclosure prudence regardless of what the Commission formally requires. If the auditor will not perform that review without a Form 10-Q, the issuer will be communicating quarterly without the auditor scaffolding that has historically supported quarterly communications. If the auditor will perform the review, the cost savings the proposing release contemplates are at least partly illusory.

The Commission should consider directly engaging with the PCAOB and the AICPA in advance of adoption to clarify the auditor's posture on interim review work for semiannual filers, and should consider whether companion staff guidance or PCAOB rulemaking is needed to ensure a consistent profession-wide approach. Without that clarification, the proposal as adopted will leave electing issuers and their boards to negotiate auditor involvement on a case-by-case basis, with predictable variability in cost, scope, and rigor across the issuer population.

B. The audit committee oversight question

Audit committees of public companies have organized their oversight cadence around the quarterly Form 10-Q cycle for decades. The agenda items, the meeting frequency, the auditor interactions, the financial statement review, the disclosure committee report-out, the sub-certifications, the internal audit reporting, the management representation letters, and the documented sign-off processes are all built around four cycles per fiscal year with a defined statutory artifact at the conclusion of each. Moving to two formal cycles per fiscal year does not reduce the audit committee's oversight responsibility. It removes the rhythm that has historically structured how that responsibility is discharged.

An audit committee that elects to maintain quarterly review discipline despite the move to semiannual filings will be doing more work, not less, because it will be running its full process without the external statutory deadline that has historically driven it. An audit committee that permits the off-cycle quarters to become lighter-touch reviews will be accepting a material reduction in oversight at exactly the moments when the company is still communicating quarterly to the market. Neither outcome is what the cost-savings framing of the proposal anticipates. The Commission should consider whether the final release should include express guidance to audit committees of electing companies regarding the level of off-cycle quarter oversight expected, and should consider whether stock exchange listing standards governing audit committee responsibilities require corresponding amendment to address the semiannual filer context.

C. The disclosure committee question

Item 307 of Regulation S-K requires an express attestation by the principal executive and principal financial officers regarding the effectiveness of disclosure controls and procedures, made in each Form 10-Q and Form 10-K. The disclosure committee process that supports that attestation has, in practice, become a quarterly institutional discipline at most public companies. For semiannual filers, the Item 307 attestation will be made only in the Form 10-S and Form 10-K. The off-cycle quarter earnings release and conference call will not be supported by a contemporaneous Item 307 attestation, because no periodic report is being filed. The question whether the off-cycle quarter receives the same disclosure committee discipline as the on-cycle quarter is left entirely to issuer judgment under the proposal as drafted.

The Commission should consider whether semiannual filers should be required to disclose, in their Form 10-S or Form 10-K, whether the disclosure committee has reviewed any voluntary quarterly information released during the off-cycle period to a standard substantially equivalent to the standard applied to a Form 10-Q. A disclosure of this kind would not require the disclosure committee process to be applied. It would require the issuer to state whether it was applied, which is itself a meaningful disclosure to investors and a meaningful protection against the disclosure liability gap I have described.

III. A proposed framework for semiannual filers that continue quarterly market communications

If a company elects semiannual reporting and continues to engage the market on a quarterly cadence, which I expect will be the operating posture of the substantial majority of electing issuers, the institutional scaffolding that has historically made quarterly communications defensible should be preserved deliberately rather than allowed to erode by inattention. I propose four components, which I respectfully suggest the Commission consider either as elements of the final rule, as elements of companion staff guidance, or as expectations articulated in the adopting release's discussion of the hybrid approach.

Component 1: A voluntary quarterly business update document, treated as a deliberate disclosure artifact Semiannual filers that issue quarterly earnings releases should be expected to treat those releases as deliberate disclosure artifacts subject to substantially the same internal review and approval process applied to a Form 10-Q. The document should contain the financial information, MD&A discussion, material developments, and forward-looking statement framework the market actually expects. It may be furnished under Item 2.02 or filed under Item 8.01 of Form 8-K depending on the issuer's circumstances and counsel's judgment regarding the litigation calculus. The Commission should consider clarifying in the adopting release that the institutional record sitting behind a voluntary quarterly release is a relevant factor in any subsequent Rule 10b-5 analysis, and that issuers that elect semiannual reporting do not thereby reduce the standard of care expected in connection with their continuing quarterly communications.

Component 2: Auditor involvement calibrated to the issuer's risk profile

As described above, the Commission should engage with the PCAOB and the AICPA to clarify the profession's posture on interim review work for semiannual filers. In the absence of profession-wide clarification, electing issuers should be expected to obtain interim review work in connection with quarterly financial information released to the market wherever the issuer's circumstances make such review prudent. The Commission should consider whether the final release should include a discussion of the factors relevant to that determination, including institutional ownership profile, capital markets activity, expected material disclosure events during the off-cycle period, and the issuer's history of restatements or material weakness disclosures.

Component 3: A preserved disclosure committee and audit committee process operating on a quarterly cadence

Audit committee charters, disclosure committee charters, and internal disclosure controls policies of electing issuers should be updated to reflect the semiannual reporting cadence and to make clear that off-cycle quarters receive substantially the same governance treatment as on-cycle quarters even though the artifact at the conclusion of the off-cycle quarter is a furnished release rather than a filed periodic report. The Commission should consider whether the adopting release should articulate the expectation that electing issuers maintain a documented disclosure and audit committee process for off-cycle quarter communications, and whether disclosure of the existence of that process should be required in the Form 10-S or Form 10-K.

Component 4: A redesigned investor relations cadence

Removing two formal quarterly earnings cycles from the issuer's annual disclosure calendar does not reduce the underlying demand for institutional engagement. It diffuses that engagement across a larger number of less structured touchpoints. Investor day presentations, conference appearances, sell-side analyst meetings, one-on-one investor calls, and mid-period management road shows will be the vehicles through which institutional engagement continues, and each of those touchpoints carries its own Regulation FD exposure. Regulation FD does not turn on the cadence of formal periodic reporting. It turns on whether material non-public information is disclosed selectively. Spreading the same engagement demand across a larger surface area, without the concentrated discipline of four well-rehearsed earnings cycles per year, increases Regulation FD risk for electing issuers, and most issuers' Regulation FD processes are not currently designed to manage the larger surface area. The Commission should consider whether the adopting release should articulate the expectation that electing issuers conduct a deliberate review of their investor relations protocols and Regulation FD procedures in connection with the election.

IV. Who the election actually fits, and the on-ramp question

The proposing release identifies smaller reporting companies, emerging growth companies, and companies in industries where investors focus on business and regulatory developments rather than interim financial results as the natural beneficiaries of the election. I agree with that identification as far as it goes. The election will be genuinely well-suited to a specific subset of the public company population. Development-stage companies whose investors track milestones rather than revenue trajectories. Companies without active capital markets activity. Companies without bank financing structured around quarterly covenant certifications. Companies without meaningful sell-side analyst coverage. Companies whose institutional ownership profile does not generate quarterly engagement demand. For issuers in this category, the quarterly cadence has often been disproportionate to the operational tempo of the business, and the cost savings the proposing release contemplates will be more fully realized because the underlying market demand for quarterly information is genuinely lower.

The question the proposing release does not engage with, and the question I respectfully submit the Commission should address in the final release, is what happens to these issuers when they outgrow the conditions that made the election attractive in the first place. The natural arc of a public company that goes public as a smaller reporting company or an emerging growth company is one in which, over time, the company grows revenues, attracts analyst coverage, develops capital markets ambitions, takes on bank financing, accumulates institutional ownership, and eventually graduates to accelerated or large accelerated filer status. The on-ramp from early-stage public company to mature public company is a real institutional progression, and the disclosure cadence the company runs on during that progression is part of the institutional infrastructure that supports it. The question is whether the semiannual election helps issuers traverse that on-ramp or whether it institutionalizes a lighter-touch disclosure posture that becomes a structural impediment when the company is ready to graduate.

The case for the election as an on-ramp aid is straightforward. Lower reporting cost during the early public years lets the company conserve capital for business growth, which is precisely the Commission's stated policy objective. Less management distraction during the early public years lets the executive team focus on operational execution at the moment when execution matters most. Fewer Sunday nights spent on the Form 10-Q cycle is not a trivial benefit for a thinly-resourced management team running a recently public company. For issuers whose early public years are genuinely about building the business rather than engaging the capital markets, the election may be exactly the kind of regulatory flexibility that supports the on-ramp.

The case against the election as an on-ramp aid is also straightforward. The disclosure cadence a company runs on shapes the institutional discipline the company builds around its public reporting. A company that has filed Form 10-Q quarterly from the date of its initial public offering has, by the time it is ready for accelerated filer status, developed a disclosure committee process, an audit committee oversight cadence, an investor relations function, an internal audit posture, and an executive team comfortable with the quarterly reporting rhythm. A company that has filed Form 10-S semiannually for the same period has not necessarily developed any of those institutional muscles, because the statutory cadence has not required them to be exercised. When the company is ready to access the capital markets in size, to attract sell-side analyst coverage, to take on bank financing structured around quarterly covenants, or to be acquired by or acquire another public company, the institutional infrastructure that supports those activities is not necessarily in place. Building that infrastructure under deadline pressure, while simultaneously executing the transaction or relationship that requires it, is materially harder than building it organically over the course of the public company life cycle.

The honest answer is that the on-ramp question is bidirectional. The election will help some smaller reporting companies and emerging growth companies that would otherwise be unable to bear the cost of being public at all. It will also box in some smaller reporting companies and emerging growth companies that elect in early and then find themselves underprepared for the institutional demands of mature public company status when they reach it. The Commission should be candid about that tradeoff in the final release rather than presenting the election as an unqualified benefit to the smaller issuer population.

Two structural consequences follow from this analysis. First, larger issuers will overwhelmingly not elect semiannual reporting. The institutional ownership, analyst coverage, capital markets activity, and lender expectations that characterize the large-cap public company population make the election operationally unworkable for those issuers regardless of its cost-savings appeal. The Commission should expect the elected population to be concentrated almost entirely in smaller reporting companies, emerging growth companies, and development-stage issuers. Second, the resulting bifurcation between quarterly filers (predominantly mature, larger-cap, institutionally-owned) and semiannual filers (predominantly smaller, newer, development-stage) is a structural change to the public company population that the proposing release does not address as such. Whether that bifurcation is consistent with the Commission's broader investor protection objectives, and whether it supports or undermines the policy goal of encouraging more companies to go and remain public, is a question the Commission should engage with in the final release.

The on-ramp question matters most for the companies the proposing release is most focused on supporting. The Commission should consider, in the final release, articulating the expectation that issuers electing semiannual reporting maintain a deliberate institutional posture that preserves the option to graduate to quarterly reporting cleanly when business circumstances warrant. The four-component framework set forth in Section III above is one way to operationalize that expectation. Without it, the election risks producing a class of public companies that has captured the early-stage cost savings but lost the institutional discipline needed to make the on-ramp work.

V. Responses to specific requests for comment

I respond below to several of the Commission's numbered requests for comment that bear directly on the issues raised in this letter.

On voluntary quarterly disclosures and the hybrid approach

The Commission asks whether companies that elect semiannual reporting will continue to provide voluntary quarterly information and, if so, what form that information will take and whether the Commission should provide guidance. My view, based on twenty-seven years of practice advising public companies, is that the substantial majority of electing issuers will continue to provide quarterly information in some form because the underlying market demand for that information will not change. The Commission should provide guidance, ideally in the adopting release, on the standard of care expected in connection with voluntary quarterly disclosures, including the expectation that disclosure committee and audit committee discipline will be applied substantially as it would be in connection with a Form 10-Q. Without that guidance, the proposal effectively creates a class of quarterly market communications that fall outside the institutional discipline that has historically supported quarterly disclosure in the United States, and that result is inconsistent with the investor protection objectives the Commission has articulated as central to its mission.

On internal controls and quarterly review

The Commission asks whether the proposal would affect internal controls or quarterly accountant reviews. My view is that the proposal materially affects both. Internal control over financial reporting is operationally a continuous function, but the Section 302 and 906 certifications, the Item 4 attestation, and the disclosure controls and procedures evaluation that accompany each Form 10-Q create discrete points at which internal control evaluation is documented, attested to, and made part of the institutional record. Removing two of those points per fiscal year does not change the underlying control environment, but it removes two of the formal occasions on which the control environment is evaluated and documented. For accountant reviews, as discussed in Section II.A above, the profession's posture is unresolved, and the Commission should engage with the PCAOB and the AICPA to clarify it in advance of adoption.

On insider trading policies and trading window practices

The Commission asks whether the proposal would affect insider trading policies and trading window practices. My view is that semiannual reporting will significantly complicate trading window administration for electing issuers and will require careful redesign of Rule 10b5-1 plan practices. Most public company insider trading policies define blackout periods by reference to the quarterly earnings cycle and the Form 10-Q filing. For semiannual filers, the absence of two of those quarterly anchors will require either an extension of blackout periods (effectively reducing trading windows substantially) or a redesign of the blackout framework around the voluntary quarterly disclosure cadence. Rule 10b5-1 plans entered into under the December 2022 amendments contain cooling-off periods, certifications, and other architecture predicated on the existence of a regular periodic reporting cadence. The Commission should consider whether companion guidance on Rule 10b5-1 plan administration for semiannual filers is appropriate.

On capital markets activity and registered offerings

The Commission asks how the proposal will affect the ability of electing issuers to conduct registered offerings, including the staleness of financial statements for registration statement purposes. My view is that the Regulation S-X staleness amendments included in the proposal address the technical question but do not address the practical market question, which is whether underwriters, investors, and rating agencies will be willing to participate in offerings supported only by semiannual financial information. In my experience advising issuers in registered offerings, the comfort letter framework under SAS 100 and the underwriter due diligence framework under Section 11 both rely heavily on the availability of reviewed interim financial information that is reasonably current. The 135-day rule under existing PCAOB standards for negative assurance in comfort letters, which the Commission has acknowledged in the proposing release, is the most concrete example of this dependency. The Commission should consider whether final adoption should be coordinated with PCAOB action to ensure that semiannual filers have a workable path to access the capital markets between Form 10-S filings. Absent such coordination, electing issuers may find that the cost savings from semiannual reporting are offset by reduced flexibility in accessing the capital markets, which would frustrate the proposal's policy objective of reducing the burden of public company status.

VI. Specific recommendations for the final release

I respectfully offer three specific recommendations for the Commission's consideration in connection with final adoption of the proposed amendments.

First, the adopting release should articulate the expectation that semiannual filers that continue to provide voluntary quarterly information apply substantially the same disclosure committee and audit committee discipline to that information as they would apply to a Form 10-Q. The adopting release should make clear that the election of semiannual reporting does not reduce the standard of care expected in connection with quarterly market communications, and that the institutional record supporting voluntary quarterly disclosures is a relevant factor in any subsequent enforcement or private action analysis.

Second, the Commission should coordinate with the PCAOB and the AICPA to clarify the auditing profession's posture on interim review work for semiannual filers in advance of final adoption. Without such coordination, electing issuers and their boards will be required to negotiate auditor involvement on a case-by-case basis, with predictable variability in cost, scope, and rigor that will undermine both the cost-savings rationale of the proposal and the disclosure integrity of the resulting periodic reporting framework.

Third, the Commission should require electing issuers to disclose, in their Form 10-S and Form 10-K, the issuer's practice with respect to off-cycle quarterly market communications, including whether the issuer issues quarterly earnings releases, whether disclosure committee and audit committee review processes are applied to those communications, and whether interim review work is performed by the issuer's independent registered public accounting firm in connection with those communications. A disclosure requirement of this kind would not mandate any particular practice. It would require the issuer to state its practice, which is itself a meaningful disclosure to investors and a meaningful safeguard against the disclosure liability gap I have described.

VII. Conclusion

The Commission's objective in proposing optional semiannual reporting is defensible. The proposal would offer real relief to a subset of reporting companies for whom the quarterly cadence has always been disproportionate to the operational tempo of the business, and the election structure preserves the existing quarterly framework as the default for issuers for whom it remains appropriate. My concern is not with the election. It is with the operational consequences of the hybrid approach the proposing release contemplates, with the disclosure liability gap that follows from removing the formal quarterly filing without addressing what supports the continuing quarterly market communications that will, in practice, accompany the election for most electing issuers, and with the on-ramp question that follows from the bifurcation the proposal will produce within the public company population.

The framework and recommendations set forth above are intended to be constructive. They accept the policy choice the Commission has made and address the operational architecture that needs to accompany it. I would welcome the opportunity to discuss any of the issues raised in this letter with the staff. I can be reached at the contact information below.
